Britain fought World War II to destroy Germany

Hitler admired the British Empire.

Adolf Hitler never wanted a war with Great Britain. For Hitler, Britain was Germany's natural ally and the nation he most admired. Hitler had no ambitions against Britain or its Empire, and all captured records clearly demonstrate this. [1]

Britain fought World War II to destroy Germany

Hitler never planned a world war either. British historian AJP Taylor has debunked the myth of a major German military buildup:

In 1938-39, the last year of peace, Germany spent about 15% of its gross national product on armaments. The British share was almost as high. German defense spending was actually reduced after Munich and remained at this lower level, so that British production of aircraft, for example, was far ahead of Germany's in 1940. When war broke out in 1939, Germany had 1,000 modern fighter aircraft and 800 bombers; Britain and France had 950 fighter planes and 1,300 bombers. The Germans had 3,500 tanks, Britain and France had 3,850. In any case, Allied intelligence estimated German strength at more than double the actual number. As usual, it was believed that Hitler had planned and prepared for a major war. In reality, he hadn't. [2]

Taylor further explained that Hitler did not intend or foresee a major war: He did not plan a major war; therefore it did not matter that Germany was not prepared for one. Hitler deliberately out the "deep rearmament" suggested to him by his technical advisors. He was not interested in preparing for a long war against the great powers. He opted instead for a "broad-based rearmament" – a front-line army with no reserves, sufficient only for a quick strike. Under Hitler's leadership, Germany was prepared for war of nerves - the only war he understood and in which he was not equipped to conquer Europe... When we consider German rearmament, we leave the mystical regions of Hitler's psychology and find an answer in the realm of facts. The answer is clear. The state of German armaments in 1939 is decisive evidence that Hitler was not thinking of a general war and probably did not intend war at all. [3]

The British historian and economist Adam Tooze writes that the proportion of German economic output that was spent on the military had risen to almost 20% shortly before the war.[4] However, Tooze admits that Hitler had no plan to defeat the British Empire. Tooze writes: " So we are faced with the truly dizzying conclusion that Hitler went to war in September 1939 without a coherent plan for how to actually defeat the British Empire, his main adversary. "[5]

After Britain and France declared war on Germany, Hitler sought to make peace. Hitler confided to his inner circle: " If we avoid all acts of war on our side, the whole thing will disappear air. Once we sink a ship and they have heavy casualties, the war party over there will gain strength. " [7] Hitler made a peace offer on October 6, 1939, which was quickly rejected. Undo the leaders of the Soviet Union, who wanted a general European war, were relieved by the quick rejection of Hitler's offer.

The German offensive against Dunkirk was stopped by Hitler's order on May 24, 1940. German Field Marshal Gerd von Rundstedt insisted that his hands were tied by Hitler's instruction spoke with von Rundstedt and two important men on his staff, Major General Georg von Sodenstern and Günther Blumentritt. As General Blumentritt told the story: He [Hitler] amazed us speaking with admiration of the British Empire, the necessity of its existence, and the civilization that Britain had brought to the world... He said everything he wanted from Britain What it want is for it to recognize Germany's position on the continent. The return of Germany's lost colonies would be desirable but not essential, and he would even offer to support Britain with if it got into trouble somewhere. [8]

Hitler said to his friend Gerdy Troost: " The blood of every single Englishman is too valuable to be shed. Our two peoples belong together, racially and traditionally - that is and has always my goal, even if our generals cannot understand that. " [9]

Hitler stated in one of his dictations on February 26, 1945: " Churchill did not appreciate the generosity and chivalry which I have shown hundreds of times by avoiding extremes towards England. I deliberately spared the fleeing British at Dunkirk. If only someone could have made them understand that the recognition of our leadership on the continent, which I had just cut out painlessly but which they stubbornly resisted, could bring nothing but advantages for themselves. " [10]

After Hitler gave him Dunkirk, Churchill refused to acknowledge it. Instead, Churchill described the evacuation of British troops from the beaches of Dunkirk as a heroic miracle performed by the British navy. Churchill became even more bellicose in his determination to continue the war. [11]

Hitler's desire to preserve the British Empire was expressed on another occasion when the Allies' military fortunes were at their lowest ebb. When France called for an armistice, German Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop, in a strictly private conversation with Italian Foreign Minister Count Galeazzo Ciano, summarized Hitler's attitude towards Britain as follows: H [Ribbentrop] said that, in the Führer's view, the existence of the British Empire is very useful as an element of stability and social order in the world. Under current circumstances it would be impossible to replace it with another similar organization. That is why the leader – as he recently publicly stated – does not want the destruction of the British Empire. He demands that Britain renounce some of its possessions and recognize the fait accompli. Under these conditions Hitler would be willing to reach an agreement. [12]

After Dunkirk, Ribbentrop wrote that Hitler was enthusiastic about a quick peace agreement with England. Hitler outlined the peace terms he was prepared to offer the British: " There were only a few points, and the first point is that nothing must happen between England and Germany which would in any way injure the reputation of Great Britain. Secondly, Britain must give back one or two of our old colonies. That's the only thing we want. " [13]

On June 25, 1940, Hitler called Joseph Goebbels to set the terms of an agreement with Great Britain. Goebbels wrote in his diary: ...[The Führer] Believes that the Empire must be preserved possible. Because if it is torn apart, then it will not be us, but foreign and even hostile powers that will get it. But if England wants no other way, then she must be overthrown. However, the leader would agree to a peace on the following basis: out of Europe, colonies and mandates back. Compensation for what was stolen from us after the World War... [14]

After the fall of France in June 1940, Hitler took the initiative to end the war. In a victory speech on July 19, 1940, Hitler declared that it had never been his intention to destroy or even harm the British Empire. Hitler made a general offer of peace with the following words: At this hour I feel obliged to make another appeal to reason in England before my conscience. I believe I can do this because I am not asking for anything as a defeated person, but as a victor I am only speaking for reason. I see no reason that could force this fight to continue. [15]

This speech was followed by private diplomatic overtures to Britain from Sweden, the United States and the Vatican. There is no question that Hitler was desperate to end the war. But Churchill had gone to war with the goal of destroying Germany. Churchill was not concerned with saving the British Empire from destruction. British Foreign Secretary Lord Halifax also wanted to continue and rejected Hitler's " call to surrender at will " [16]. On July 22, 1940, Hitler's peace offer was officially rejected. [17]

Alan Clark, Margaret Thatcher's defense adviser, believed that only Churchill's obsession with Hitler and his " single-minded determination to continue the war " prevented him from accepting the German offer to end the war in 1940: " There were several occasions in which a rational leader could have obtained first reasonable, then excellent conditions from Germany. Hitler's offer offered peace in July 1940, before the Battle of Britain began. After the RAF victory, German terms were still available, but now weighted more in Britain's favor. " [18]

On August 14, 1940, during the Battle of Britain, Hitler called his field marshals to the Reich Chancellery to make it clear to them that victory over Great Britain must not lead to the collapse of the British Empire: Germany does not seek to destroy England, because the beneficiaries would not be Germany, but Japan in the East, Russia in India, Italy in the Mediterranean, American world trade. For this reason, peace with England is possible, but not with Churchill as Prime Minister. So wait and see: Air Force results, possible new elections. [19]

Hitler continued to look for a way to end the war he never wanted. On May 10, 1941, Deputy Leader Rudolf Hess flew to Scotland in a Messerschmitt 110 to try to negotiate a peace treaty with Great Britain. On May 11, 1941, Rudolf Hess explained to the Duke of Hamilton why he had flown to Scotland: " I am on a mission of humanity. The Führer does not want to defeat England. He wants to stop fighting. " [20]

While it cannot be proven that Hess flew to Scotland with Hitler's knowledge and consent, the available evidence suggests that he did. The relationship between Hess and Hitler was so close that one can logically assume that Hess would not have taken such an important step without informing Hitler first. In addition, Hess was forbidden to speak publicly about his mission during his entire 40-year imprisonment in Spandau Prison. This "news blackout" was apparently imposed because Hess knew things that, if made public, would have been highly embarrassing for the Allied governments. [21]

Allies demand unconditional surrender

A peaceful settlement of the war was impossible after the Allied policy of unconditional surrender was announced at a press conference in Casablanca on January 23, 1943. The Allied policy of unconditional surrender ensured that the war would be fought to its bitter end. Maurice Hankey, a veteran British statesman, summarized the impact of the policy of unconditional surrender as follows:

It embittered the war, made a fight to the end inevitable, slammed the door on the possibility of either side offering terms or entering into negotiations, gave the Germans and the Japanese

Numerous other historians and politicians have noted that Britain and the United States made it impossible for Germany to achieve a peaceful resolution to the war. It is generally accepted that Hitler did not want war with either Great Britain or the United States.[23] Instead, Britain and the United States wanted war with Germany. In this context, US Representative Hamilton Fish stated:

If Roosevelt and Churchill truly wanted to free the world from the threat of totalitarianism, they had their God-given chance on June 22, 1941. England could have withdrawn from the war and made peace with Hitler on the most favorable terms. Hitler had no intentions against the United States, so we would not have been endangered by this turn of events. Then Hitler and Stalin would have fought each other to the point of exhaustion. This is exactly what Baldwin and Chamberlain's foreign policy originally envisioned. Then-Senator Truman strongly supported that policy, as did Senator Vandenberg and many others. It would have left the United States and England as the dominant powers in the world, and they could have ensured that the world remained mostly free. [24]

...
Joachim von Ribbentrop had told MP Hamilton Fish that cooperation between England and Germany was essential to maintaining peace. Hitler even had "offered to place 15 German army divisions and the entire fleet at the disposal of the British government to support their empire in the event of war anywhere in the world." Fish did not believe this statement from Ribbentrop at the time, but it was confirmed years later.[25]

...
Hitler expressed his surprise to the Swedish researcher Sven Hedin at Britain's refusal to accept his peace offers. Hitler said he had repeatedly extended the hand of peace and friendship to the British, and each time they had given him a black eye in response. Hitler said: "The survival of the British Empire is also in Germany's interest because if Britain loses India, we will have nothing." [26]

...
Even a British diplomat from Churchill's own conservative party confessed: "Churchill was regarded throughout the world as the main representative of war policy. If he had been included in government at a time when the balance between war and peace was still in limbo, it would have tipped the balance in favor of war." [27]

...
Winston Churchill's refusal to negotiate peace with Germany is notable in that Churchill spoke of the evils of communism. Churchill once said of communism:

...
It is not just a creed but a plan of action. A communist is not only an advocate of certain opinions, but also a promiser of a well-thought-out means of enforcing them. The anatomy of disunity and revolution was studied in all phases and aspects and a veritable exercise book was prepared in the scientific spirit of sabotage of all existing institutions. You don't have to trust non-communists. Every act of goodwill, tolerance, reconciliation, mercy or generosity on the part of governments or statesmen is used to their ruin. Then, when the time is right and the moment is right, every form of lethal force, from revolt to private assassination, must be used without hesitation or hesitation. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of freedom and democracy once the power apparatus is in the hands of the Brotherhood, all opposition, all dissent must be extinguished with death. Democracy is just a tool that you use and then break. [28]

...
Despite his antipathy to communism, Churchill ignored all German peace efforts and joined the Soviet Union in the war against Germany.

On January 20, 1943, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph E. Davies revealed that Hitler offered to resign from office if it would allow Britain to make peace with Germany. Churchill and other British politicians rejected Hitler's offer.[29]

Churchill never tried to make peace with Germany. In a letter to Stalin dated January 1, 1944, Churchill said: "We never thought of peace, even in the year when we were all alone and we easily have made peace without serious loss to the British Empire, and largely at your [Stalin's] expense. Why should we think about this now, when the matter is moving towards victory for three of us?" [30]

...
It is well known that Churchill loved war. The English journalist FS Oliver wrote about Churchill: "From his youth, Mr. Churchill loved three things with all his heart, with all his mind, with all his soul and with all his strength: the war, politics and himself. War because of its dangers, he loved politics for the same reason, and he always loved himself because he knew his mind was dangerous..." [31] Churchill always wanted to continue the war against Germany rather than negotiate a peaceful solution.

Conclusion

...
Even leading representatives of the German resistance movement recognized that the Allies' policy, which was aimed at unconditional surrender, would not change even after Hitler's death. On July 18, 1944, Otto John returned from fruitless negotiations with Allied representatives in Madrid and informed his co-conspirators that unconditional surrender would remain in place even if they succeeded in killing Hitler.

...
Dr. Eugen Gerstenmaier, a co-conspirator who became President of the West German Bundestag after the war, said in a 1975 interview: "What we didn't really want to understand in the German resistance during the war, we later fully learned: that this war was ultimately not against Hitler, but was waged against Germany." [32]
